

GRAINGER MCKOY

LIMITED EDITION SCULPTURE

Revised April, 2008

The Mourning Doves is Grainger's most complex bronze sculpture. Comprised of nearly 40 individual parts that were first carved in wood (wood original below), then molded and lost-wax cast (roughcast parts on the bottom-left) before finishing and assembly. In 2004, Grainger began painting some of his bronze sculptures (shown on the left). They are identical to the wood original.

The Woodcock is cast in both bronze and sterling silver. This was also a complex sculpture, requiring over 30 individual molds to make.

The Recovery Stroke sculpture is actually the wing of a Pintail duck.

The Recovery Stroke is a sculpture whose metaphors abound, and we are delighted that the Hollings Cancer Center in Charleston, SC, will install the first 8' version of the sculpture in 2007. Shown to the left are the individual wood carvings that were cast to create the life-sized sculptures above. On the next page is Grainger with the 8' tall Recovery Stroke in wood and bronze, respectively.

Grainger was inspired to create this petite Carolina Wren sculpture from a memory of his father hiding the key to an outbuilding on a shelf above the door. A wren decided to build a nest there as well, and this sculpture captures the angry female defending her home whenever the elder McKoy reached for the key.

The Artist Studies, or Maquettes, are smaller, simpler sculptures inspired, in some cases, by one of Grainger's larger sculptures. The tallest is 12", making them ideal for a mantelpiece or desk. Each is cast in bronze, signed and numbered.

The Pintails to the left were inspired by Grainger's larger sculpture of the same name, below (collection of John A. Leutkemeyer, Jr.).

He has not yet carved an Eagle, but was drawn to the simple, sure lines of one's primary feather, bottom. The feather comes with hardware that allows it to easily attach to a wall if desired.
